When dating. Many products you have in your home have unique serial numbers printed on them. Companies assign serial numbers to their products. If you ever have to contact a company regarding a product, one of the first things you'll need to do is provide the serial number of the item.What's a Serial NumberA serial number is a unique string of numbers and letters assigned to a product or item. You could compare a serial number to a fingerprint, in that each number is uniquely tied to a specific item to identify it. Depending on the item, a serial number might be stamped onto a product sticker, engraved into metal or embedded into an electronic device. Serial numbers can even be connected to the purchaser, in the case of software programs.How Serial Numbers Are CreatedIt's possible to use tools or programs to generate serial numbers. These tools create random codes in batches, which can then be assigned to products. With the assignment of serial numbers, it's necessary to record each assignment to track the products. Then, the serial numbers will enable management of inventory or products that are sold.Typical Uses of Serial NumbersManufacturers use serial numbers to track merchandise, often for quality control purposes. Serial numbers can make it possible to recall products when necessary. The manufacturer would publish a list of serial numbers, possibly also contacting purchasers if contact information is kept on file.Serial numbers connected to software enable manufacturers to limit the number of installations performed for each product. Installation of the software registers it with the manufacturer, who can then block any further installations from occurring.Serial numbers are also useful for managing warranties. After purchase, manufacturers will require that consumers register products by providing serial numbers. Then, if a consumer wants to initiate a warranty request, it will be necessary to provide the date of purchase and serial number.Internal Use of Serial NumbersInternally, a company can use serial numbers to manage inventory. When tools or equipment are used, the company can identify and track when and where the equipment is used to make sure it is returned to storage.Tips for Finding Serial NumbersLocating a serial number can be challenging. If you have an appliance or a hardware device, look on the bottom or back of the item. You'll usually find a sticker with the model number and serial number printed on it. Sometimes serial numbers are engraved in metal too. For software installed with a CD, look on the CD case or in the packaging to find the serial number. Sometimes serial numbers are also embedded in the product information of the software. MORE FROM QUESTIONSANSWERED.NET By Jodi "Jato" Thornton Updated September 21, 2017 Since the Gun Control Act of 1968 went into effect, American firearms manufacturers must include a serial number on every gun's frame or receiver for identification. This serial number can be used to search for the make, model and history of a gun, but the type of information the average person can get is limited. Here's the scoop on what info a gun's serial number can dish out. As of 2002, imported firearms must also bear a serial number. The serial number is just one required piece of information that must be engraved on a gun, and all firearms must bear the following engraved on the piece: Manufacturer's name Country of origin Model designation, if one is assigned Caliber or gauge of the gun Importer information, including the importer's city or state. There are a few exceptions, like machine guns, but if your gun has a serial number and no other additional markings, it was probably manufactured before 2002. Whether your pre-2002 gun has only a serial number mark or you're sorting through a list of serial numbers for guns to be distributed, for example, in a will, there are ways to figure out the make and model. Do a Google search. Enter the words "gun serial number" in the search bar, followed by the portion of the number before the first hyphen. This tells you the gun's maker. For example, with a gun serial number of 331-12345, just enter 331. The search "gun serial number 331" brings up results for the Ruger SR9, which is the gun's correct make and model. For serial numbers with multiple hyphens, you might need to include additional numbers between the first and second hyphen to get the most accurate results. For an serial number of 16-003-123-95, enter "gun serial number 16-003" to learn that the number is for an AYA shotgun. Check the manufacturer's website. Once you've determined the model, go on the manufacturer's website to find which year the gun was made, from the digits following the dash. In this instance, 331-12345 was manufactured in the year 2007. In the case of the AYA number, the gun was manufactured in 1995, evidenced by the last two numbers, and "123" is its identifying number. Check the NRA Museum for antiques. If Google doesn't give you satisfactory information, the NRA Museum online might provide leads through their serialization database. The 47-page PDF lists gun manufacturers and their serial numbers dating back to the 1890s. Buying a gun through a licensed gun shop will help ensure you're not buying a stolen weapon or one that was involved in a crime, but what if you're buying from a private individual? Check your state's gun laws. Not all states allow private individuals to sell firearms without going through a licensed firearms dealer. If the sale is illegal, chances are the gun is too. Check the serial number online through HotGunz, Stolen-Property or other stolen firearm sites. Not getting a hit doesn't mean the gun isn't stolen, however. The sites' information comes from citizens reporting their stolen guns. People who lose their guns' serial numbers won't be able to report them on the sites. Get a notarized bill of sale for any gun you purchase so you'll have some protection if the gun is later identified as stolen property. Enlist the help of law enforcement. Tracing a gun's serial number through the ATF to see if it was involved in a crime is only permissible for law enforcement agencies involved in a bona fide criminal investigation where a gun is recovered or suspected to be involved. However, some police stations will run checks through the National Crime Information Center to see if the gun is listed as stolen.
